

A publication of The Washington Post

Contact:

Sandy Yeilding (202) 334-6393

Release Date:

November 24, 2003

Express Increases Circulation

The Washington Post Company's free commuter newspaper, Express, announced today that it is increasing its circulation from 125,000 to 150,000 copies.

The 20 percent circulation increase reflects the strong consumer demand for the publication since its launch in early August. With a weekday press run of 125,000, Express finds that it routinely runs out of papers by 9:00 a.m. at a number of outlets throughout the Washington metropolitan area. Express is distributed free-of-charge at area Metrorail stations, college campuses and street locations with high daytime foot traffic. The additional circulation is currently being phased in over a several week period.

"We are pleased to make more copies of Express available to meet the market demand," said Christopher Ma, Publisher of Express. "We will continue to evaluate the opportunity to further increase circulation."

Express Publications Company, LLC, is a subsidiary of The Washington Post Company.

###